BACKGROUND

Advance care planning is a service that supports conversations between patients and their doctors and non-physician practitioners (NPPs) to decide what type of care may be right for them in the event of life-limiting conditions or incapacitating illness. Advance care planning is not the same as an advance directive, which is a legal document that specifies what should happen if a person is no longer able to make his/her own medical decisions. Advance directives take many forms, such as living wills and durable powers of attorney for health care.

During advance care planning conversations, doctors/NPPs may talk through and help the person plan for a time when he/she cannot make his/her own medical decisions. If the member has a life-threatening condition, the practitioner may discuss creating a disease specific plan, help the member explore his/her understanding of the illness progression, and discuss his/her own and their family's hopes, fears, and concerns. They may also talk about care choices during a critical event, and how aggressive they would like their treatment to be (e.g., resuscitation status, antibiotics, and feeding tubes).

The person does not have to have a terminal illness. Indeed, often the best time to begin to discuss end-of-life care may be before a person is diagnosed with a life-threatening condition, when there is plenty of time to consider one's preferences. Having these discussions early also may be useful in guiding future care and treatment decisions by family members and caregivers should the person become incapacitated and unable to make his/her choices known.

Voluntary ACP as defined by Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) means the face-to-face service between a physician (or other qualified health care professional) and the patient discussing advance directives, with or without completing relevant legal forms. An advance directive is a document appointing an agent and/or recording the wishes of a patient pertaining to his/her medical treatment at a future time should he/she lack decisional capacity at that time.

Examples of appropriate documentation in the member's medical record would include an account of the discussion with the beneficiary (or family members and/or surrogate) regarding the voluntary nature of the encounter; documentation indicating the explanation of advance directives (along with completion of those forms, when performed); who was present; and the time spent in the face-to-face encounter.
